The Comparative Method in Legal Research: The Art of ...

The value of comparative law is to a large extent dependent upon its method and critical scholarship. To be practically useful as well as intellectually valuable comparative law has to compare more than just rules. Comparative law, especially in relation to public law, has to embrace law and society, different regulatory mechanisms, self-reflections, traditions and legal cultures, politics, history, economics and intellectual roots. This scope makes the study of comparative law particularly ...

For this reason, one can distinguish two types of research in comparative law. The exponent of “microcomparison” analyzes the laws belonging to the same legal family. By observing their differences, he will decide whether they are justified and whether an innovation made in one country would have value if introduced elsewhere. The researcher pledged to “macrocomparison,” on the other hand, investigates those systems differing most widely from each other in order to gain insight into ...

A comparative approach to research can be invaluable for understanding broader social processes or contextualising knowledge gained from in-depth case studies. Designing effective comparative research requires clarity about the common questions, concepts and methods that are used for all the different cases. Careful planning of the elements and stages of the research process can also become particularly important if they are being conducted to a shared timetable.

Such projects may draw on several methods: the inductive method, starting from loosely defined hypotheses and moving towards their verification; the deductive method, applying a general theory to a specific case in order to interpret certain aspects; and the demonstrative method, designed to confirm and refine a theory.

Social Research Update 13: Comparative Research Methods

Comparative research is a research methodology in the social sciences that aims to make comparisons across different countries or cultures. A major problem in comparative research is that the data sets in different countries may define categories differently (for example by using different definitions of poverty) or may not use the same categories.
