Of these early piscine portraitists, the work of Samuel Fallours has gained particular notoriety for his ebullient use of color and the rather phantasmagorical manner in which he depicted his subjects. Fallours' drawing of a cowfish is only slightly less-bizarre than the actual fish.

This is an exquisite angel fish when observed in life, though the second example was clearly drawn from a dead specimen. Fallours portrays the 'devil fish' of the family Scorpaenidae – we call them lion fish nowadays – on page 13 (no. 57) and also on page 28 (no. 143); the same fish may also be those seen on page 56 (no. 287) which is very like page 60 (no. 301).

Bearing the rather unwieldy title of Fishes, crayfishes, and crabs, of diverse colours and extraordinary form, that are found around the islands of the Moluccas and on the coasts of the southern lands, this book is historically important as being the earliest known work on fishes to be produced in colour.

Poissons, Ecrevisses et Crabes

It's the expressive faces and outlandish colours, in particular, which give so many of the fish a cartoon-like quality, almost as though cast portraits from some sassy ocean-based animation. In 2010, Taschen published Samuel Fallours: Tropical Fishes of the East Indies, which features Samuel Fallours' original illustrations.
